

Connor McStay

The agile and waterfall process of software development are very similar, but that is the same with all processes of developing anything. A big difference is that the agile process break each section into smaller teams and spreads the work out between many small groups of people and the waterfall process uses a team and goes step by step. Furthermore it appears the agile process is more focused on quick response then the waterfall process is.